Environmental statement

Version 1, in effect from 19 November 2026.

Pavryn is a small company that makes online training. Our effect on the environment comes mostly from the computing that runs Pavryn Learn and from how we work. This statement says what we do about each, without claims we cannot support.

How Pavryn Learn is run

- Small by design. The service runs as two small applications that grow only when they are busy, and its database pauses when nobody is using it.
- One region. It runs in Microsoft Azure's UK South region. We do not keep copies running in other regions.
- Nothing to install or post. Learners use a web browser. There are no discs, printed workbooks or deliveries.
- Light pages. Pages load only what they need, with no advertising or third-party trackers, and videos are sent only when someone plays them.

What online training replaces

- People learn at their desk, at home or on a phone, so nobody travels to a training room.
- The training record and certificates are kept on screen. Printing a report or a certificate is a choice, not a requirement.

How we work

- Meetings by video first. We travel to a council when it is useful to be there.
- Equipment kept in use. We buy equipment to last, repair it where we can, and recycle it through a registered route at the end of its life.
- Paper kept low. We send documents electronically unless someone asks for paper.

Our suppliers

- Pavryn Learn is hosted by Microsoft, which publishes its own environmental commitments and reports on its progress each year.
- When we choose a supplier, we look at what it publishes about its environmental performance alongside price, security and data protection.

What we will do next

- Estimate the emissions of running Pavryn Learn for a year, using our hosting supplier's own figures, and publish the result here.
- Keep the service small as it grows: measure what it uses and remove what it does not need.

- Review this statement each year, and when something significant changes.
